Quality Protects Research Briefing No 3

Young People's Participation

by Dr Ruth Sinclair, Director of Research, National Children's Bureau

Quality protects Objectives:

Objective 8.0:
actively to involve users and carers in planning services and in tailoring individual packages of care; and to ensure effective mechanisms are in place to handle complaints.

Sub-objective 8.1:
to demonstrate that the views of children and families are actively sought and used in the planning, delivery and review of services.

participation is a process; children will only be able to participate actively in a climate that encourages their on-going involvement and empowerment.

Introduction

Children have a right to participate. Professionals have a responsibility to facilitate this. However, especially if it is to involve all children, participation can be challenging, in both principle and in practice (1). Children can participate in many ways - in matters that affect them personally or those that relate to children in need or to all young citizens. This briefing refers to research on all these aspects, drawing particularly on the views of children themselves.

The QP Objectives refer to all users, carers, children and families requiring support from social services. While this paper focuses on children, many of the principles and practices in promoting their participation are equally applicable to participation by families and other service users. For the sake of brevity, we use the term children throughout.

Why is participation important

The reasons for encouraging children’s participation have been presented in various ways; (2) (3) (4) (5) and can be summarised as:

- to uphold children's rights: children are citizens and service users and share the same fundamental rights to participate as other

- to fulfil legal responsibilities: the right of children to be consulted is included in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (6) the Children Act 1989, Best Value Framework, Children's Service Plans Guidance to improve services: consulting with children enables services to be improved and adapted to meet changing needs, that children can help define, participation gives them a level of influence and an element of choice about the provision offered and can help them understand their own wants and needs

- to improve decision-making: participation leads to more accurate, relevant decisions, which are better informed and more likely to be implemented

- to enhance democratic processes: representative democracy can be strengthened as children gain new opportunities and are helped to become active members of their community

- to promote children’s protection: participation is an important aid to protection (7) (8) (9). A recurring theme of successive inquiries into abuse has been the failure to listen to children

- To enhance children's skills: participation helps in developing skills useful for debate, communication, negotiation, prioritization and decision-making (10)

- To empower and enhance self-esteem: effective participation can provide a sense of self-efficacy and raise self-esteem (11).

What is meant by participation?

First, we need to distinguish between participation in matters, which affect children as individuals and those that relate to them as a group.

Children's participation in decisions that affect them as individuals requires a child-centred approach. This implies taking account of their wishes and feelings and including the child's perspective in all matters. This is ongoing and requires continuous dialogue but may also be exercised around procedures such as assessment, care planning and reviews, child protection conferences, care or adoption proceedings, Family Group Conferences and complaints.

Children's participation in matters that relate to children as a group can be through the identification, development, provision, monitoring and evaluation of services and policy. They may be involved in consultation exercises (12) (13), in research, as respondents, advisers or as young researchers (14) (15) (16) (17), as part of a management committee, advisory group or community initiative (4) (18), or in delivering services by acting as mentors, counsellors, volunteers or workers.

Second, the level and nature of participation vary. Participation can mean taking part in or being present at or it can mean knowing that one's actions and views are being noted and may be acted upon - leading to empowerment (19) (20). Several typologies of participation have been developed that illustrate this. These 'ladders of participation' are adapted from Arnstein and relate to situations specific to children. They highlight the level of involvement and hence empowerment achieved by different styles of participation and can be viewed on the following page.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Citizen control</td>
<td>Delegated power</td>
<td>Child-initiated,</td>
<td>Children share power</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Involvement in service design</td>
<td>shared decisions with adults</td>
<td>and responsibility for decision making</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Delegated power</td>
<td>Child-initiated and directed</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Partnership</td>
<td>Adult-initiated, shared decisions with adults</td>
<td>Children are involved in decision making processes</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Placation</td>
<td>Consulted and informed</td>
<td>Children's views are taken into account</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Consultation</td>
<td>Assigned but informed</td>
<td>Children are supported in expressing their views</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Therapy</td>
<td>Tokenism</td>
<td>Children are listened to</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manipulation</td>
<td>Decoration</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Evaluation of the second round of Quality Protects Management Action Plans (MAPS) (25) shows increasing social services department activity. However, this is patchy; much remains to be done, particularly to involve children in their own care. Fewer than a third of first MAPs made specific reference to involving children with disabilities (26); initial analysis of second MAPs indicates a marked improvement (27).

Participation in matters affecting individual children

Children's contact with social services occurs in a variety of circumstances: through support in the community, through assessment of their needs, through being looked after, in court proceedings, or in pre- and post adoption work. However, much of the research evidence relates to their participation in specific meeting or forums.

Assessment

The child's perspective is crucial to assessment of their needs, their wishes and feelings, their understanding of past events, their ideas about what should happen in the future. This view is clearly expressed in the Department of Health Guidance on the Assessment Framework (28). There is a growing body of research highlighting the validity of the child's contribution (29) (30). Crucial to the child's effective participation is the professionals' skill in communication. Children in contact with social services are vulnerable; expressing opinions, talking about their families can raise emotional difficulties. Effective participation requires this to be acknowledged.

Care planning and reviews

The Children Act 1989 requires local authorities to draw up care plans for each child looked after and to review them regularly. It also requires that the views of the child are sought before any decision is made. There is evidence that children are increasingly involved in the process (31) although less so in the case of children with disabilities (32) and for younger children (33).

Consulting children on their wishes and feelings: Most children are consulted about their care plan, although the range and depth is limited (31). This is less likely for children with disabilities, especially learning difficulty (34); very few children under the age of five are consulted (33). The quality of consultation is improved by the use of good consultation forms or other tools and by support in using this (31) (35).

Attendance at review meetings: overall a majority of children are invited to and do attend their review (31), 55% of all children; this varies significantly by age - in one study, 37% of children aged eight or younger were invited, compared to 84% of children aged twelve or older (33).

Active participation: while the level of active participation varies, there is evidence that it was achieved at some point in around half of all meetings (31) (33). However children with severe communications difficulties were often excluded from participating as professionals lacked skills, training and confidence to elicit their wishes and feelings (32).

Supporters: while the guidance encourages enabling children to bring supporters or independent advocates, this rarely happens (31) (33).

Feedback: there is evidence that only about a third of children receive a copy of their care plan (31) (36).

Child protection case conferences

Children are rarely involved in early decisions around child protection and are given little information about the process (37); invitations to children to attend child protection conferences are increasing but it is not yet common practice (22). Where local authorities actively encourage attendance, children responded positively. In one study 80% of children mostly aged twelve or over, attended (38).

Family group conferences

Family Group Conferences have been introduced as a model of decision-making that empowers children and families and reduces the role of the state. Research suggests that FGCs have increased empowerment through participation (measured as 'contribution to planning' and 'influence over outcome') and provides some evidence that the least powerful members of the family group, especially children, do feel able to participate and to influence decisions (39). Evaluation of FGC pilots indicates that the rate of attendance by children is very similar to that at review meetings; 81% of those aged ten and over (40). Current evidence suggests that FGCs are as likely as other methods of decision making to protect the child in the short term, but less evidence is available about the long-term impact on the child’s well being (39).

Children’s experience of participation in planning
The views of children on their participation in any of these forms of planning tell a similar story (41).

- Children see their participation as important. They consider it their right and to see and be seen, to hear and be heard.
- They often find the experience uncomfortable and are sceptical about its value.
- They feel ill prepared for participation at meetings: not knowing who will be present; what will be discussed; what will happen afterwards; when and how to speak; how to say what they really feel, especially when it concerns other people who are present in the room.
- Children report that by and large, they feel they are listened to, but that what they say has little effect on the outcome.

Complaints

The Children Act 1989 for the first time gave children the right to make complaints about the service they receive from social services. Complaints procedures can offer children protection, demonstrate their right to be consulted, enable them to participate in problem solving and decision-making and contribute to improved service provision (42). The DH Guidance details the stages of the process and suggests that complaints procedures should satisfy certain principles (43): they should be accessible to users and carers; be understood by staff; they should guarantee a prompt and considered response and provide a strong problem-solving element. There is evidence that while social services departments are improving in all these aspects there is still a considerable way to go (44) (45) (46) (47) (42) (48).

Accessibility There is an increase in the proportion of children who report knowing about complaints procedure. However many are still unaware (one study (33) reports that 38% of children are unaware). This is greater among those in foster rather than in residential care, among those with disabilities and for younger children.

Staff understanding Inspections, as well as research, have identified a continuing need for staff training and support, especially in dealing with complaints at the 'informal' stage

Prompt response Only a minority of complaints are dealt with within the required 28 days (various studies suggest between 8% and 27%). Staff think the time scale unrealistic; for users the length of time taken is a major source of dissatisfaction.

Problem-solving The Guidance supports the resolution of problems early, informally and at the point of service delivery. Research suggests this can inhibit access to formal procedures, is poorly monitored, and lacks clarity for staff and users.

What helps in participation by children as individuals?

Actively involving children is a continuous process facilitated by a participatory culture. Children will only be able to participate in formal processes in a climate that encourages involvement (48), when they participate in the small as well as the big decisions (49) and when they feel empowered. Empowering children may require adults to rethink how they share their power (20). It does not mean that children must carry responsibility for decision-making that properly belongs to professionals.

Children's participation will be enhanced when adults:

Inform the child

To be active participants children need to know about systems and processes and to have information in a form that is relevant to them.

Consult the child

At its best, consultation is continuous dialogue. Children are able to express their views more fully when they are given appropriate tools and supported in their use and when adults exercise good communication skills, for example express themselves simply and clearly and use concepts which are familiar to the child (50). Many children in contact with social services are vulnerable through their past, possibly traumatic, experiences. They may have strong emotions or ambivalent feelings they find it difficult to express (51). Useful resources include those produced by NSPCC (52) and The Children's Society (53).

Prepare the child

One of the strongest messages from children is the need to be better prepared. They want to be told the purpose of the meeting beforehand: what is going to happen, what will be discussed, what the social worker or carer will say and who will be attending. A training pack designed for young people aged ten and up is available (54). Adults also need to be prepared; see for example the resource pack by Children in Wales aimed at staff working with children in middle years (55).

Take account of the child's agenda

Consultation must be flexible enough to address the issues most pertinent to the child - which may be very different from those that most concern the professional. The child's agenda may also include opinions on the best time and place to meet - for example not in school hours, or at a foster home where their own parents may feel uncomfortable.

Consider the child's needs

Children with disabilities or for whom English is not the first language may have special language needs and require a translator. Disabled children can experience difficulties with physical access and/or have problems communicating their views. Ensure there is someone who understands how they communicate and that they have access to a communication system that suits their needs, and to independent facilitators.

Facilitate use of independent support
Many children would benefit from support from friends, or advocates or independent supporters. This requires very active encouragement by both caseworkers and managers. Independent advocates or Children's Rights Officers are an important source of support to individual children and as advocates for children as a group. Standards for advocacy services will be published this year (56). Similarly, children may gain support from local or national groups, such as 'in care' groups, National Voice in England (57) or Voices from Care in Wales (58).

Re-think the style and nature of meetings

Given the strong evidence that children take their role in decision making seriously but find current practice unhelpful, promoting active participation means re-thinking the style and nature of meetings. Are they trying to serve too many purposes? Can they be broken down into smaller, more focused occasions? Can we ensure that children’s ideas contribute to this re-thinking?

Treat children with respect

Children say they feel ignored, not listened to, bored, put on the spot or talked about as if they were not there. They get irritated by ritualistic questions. They are intimidated by large meetings, especially when they don’t know everyone there. Meeting Chairs need to act to address these worries.

Give feedback

Children express great anxiety about what happens after consultations or meetings; they need to have clear, speedy feedback in a concrete form. They need to be kept informed about the progress of a complaint or the implementation of a decision. Only through feedback and receipt of a record of what has happened are they empowered to monitor subsequent implementation.

What helps in participation in matters that relate to children as a group

Increasingly, local authorities are involving children in service and policy development. A central issue is to find a balance between creating an attractive process that engages young people, and achieving valid and reliable data (59). Currently, a wide range of methods is being used, with different advantages and disadvantages (60). They include interviewing, focus groups, questionnaires, 'talk-shops', young citizen's panels, ongoing group work, peer-led research, websites, art and drama work. Many factors have been identified as assisting creative, useful and enjoyable participation (61) (62) (63).

Prepare thoroughly

- Clarify the purpose, aims and objectives – taking into account resources available.

- Have clear parameters about how much power and decision-making will (or can) be shared with children. Be honest with them about this.
• Be clear and realistic about the extent and possibility of change.

• Consider who should take part – is a representative sample of service users required? How can you include non-users of services? Have you included children not traditionally involved; those in foster care, those placed outside the local authority, those in residential special schools, black and minority ethnic children, children with disabilities (62) (63).

• Which method(s) would most suit the purpose and participants? A variety of different methods usually guarantee better information (59). Involve children in deciding this (64).

• Draw up an ethical statement, clarifying issues around consent (by children/parents), confidentiality, anonymity and disclosure (65).

• Should you consider developing a contract of participation? Will it include rewards?

• In planning, allow enough time to build up trust and rapport with participants.

• Ensure staff or facilitators have the necessary skills (66).

• Consider the long-term. This type of participation tends to be one-off exercises dealing with specific issues. Think how to establish more permanent channels for consultation and communication (17).

Think about recruitment

• Have available, in an accessible format, information for children about what is going to happen, what will be discussed, and who will be taking part. First impressions will affect decisions about whether to participate (50).

• Consider factors such as gender, ethnic and religious background, sexuality, disability, age and ability as these may play an important part in children’s experiences (67).

• Consideration should be given to whether participants have the necessary skills, knowledge, confidence, commitment and time to do what is being asked. Can you offer enough support to overcome these (68)?

• Previous and current experiences of your organisation might affect commitment. Do you need to give more encouragement to take part, reassurances that participation will not affect the services they receive (60)?

Plan for participants’ special needs

• Consider the needs of disabled children. Difficulties with physical access, written text, communication, or lack of suitable equipment and support may inhibit their full participation (69).
• Provision may be needed to develop materials and mechanisms to enable the participation by children with English as a second language, sensory impairments or with severe/complex communication needs. Consider the use of translators, visual images and symbols on forms, or qualified signers (70). Telephone interviews might be appropriate with young people who have visual or reading/writing difficulties (71).

Consider the practicalities

• Is the timing awkward or the venue intimidating for children? Do you need to make transport arrangements? Consider transport costs, accompanying adult support and necessity for childcare.

Demonstrate respect

• Be aware that children will have their own agenda and be prepared to listen (20).

• Consider your choice of language, and avoid the use of jargon.

• Remember that children also have busy lives.

Provide effective follow-up

• Are there suitable mechanisms for feeding back outcomes directly to participants involved within a sensible timescale? Children want some indication that their voices have been heard, and some explanation of the outcomes. Tell them what it is intended to achieve in the short, medium and longer-term (17).

references

(12) Growney T (ed) 1998. Sometimes you've got to shout to be heard: Stories from young people in care about getting heard, using advocates and making complaints. Voice for the Child in Care

(14) The Young Researchers, 1998. Young Opinions Great Ideas. NCB

(17) Franklin A & Madge N, 2000. In Our View: Children, teenagers and parents talk about services for young people. NCB

(18) Tearse M & West A (eds), 1997. All Together Now: Community Participation for Children and Young People. Save the Children Fund

(27) Council for Disabled Children (in press) Second Analysis of MAPs with reference to Disabled Children

(33) Thomas N & O'Kane C, 1999. Children's participation in reviews and planning meetings when they are 'looked after' in middle childhood. In Child and Family Social Work 4, pp 221-230

(34) Department of Health (SSI), 1998. Someone Else's Children: Inspections of Planning and Decision Making for Children Looked After and The Safety of Children Looked After

(45) Department of Health, 1996. 3rd Overview Report

(49) Kahan B, 1994. Growing Up In Groups. HMSO

(54) Wheal A & Sinclair R, 1995. It's Your Meeting. A guide to help young people get the most from their reviews. NCB

(57) Voices from Care CYMRU 25 Windsor Place, Cardiff, South Glamorgan CF1 3BZ Tel: 029 2039 8214

(58) National Voice, P O Box 253, Leeds LS1 3RA Tel: 0113 242 9767

researched and written by Ruth Sinclair and Anita Franklin, National Children's Bureau

Independently and anonymously reviewed by an academic and a practitioner with specialist interest in placement stability

© 2000 Department of Health, research in practice, Making Research Count